Passage 1

One of the famous tourist attractions situated in Kuala Lumpur is the Muzium Negara which is also one of the finest institutions of its kind in Southeast Asia. The Muzium Negara, barely six decades old, was charged by our first Prime Minister, Tunku Abdul Rahman with the task of helping to forge a spirit of national identity in Malaysia's multi-racial society. This museum has become the focus of this culturally rich country, a preserver of the nation's heritage.

Seriously damaged during World War II, a publicity campaign was mounted in 1962 to rebuild the museum. It was also necessary to replace the exhibits lost during the war. The campaign included, among other things, collecting artifacts, especially Malay crafts. Help came from unexpected quarters. A Malay wood carver donated 40 lengths of magnificent hand-woven silk, all of them more than 60 years old. Intricately carved doors and screens and antique furniture of an entire Chinese household came from Malacca. A woman donated a full bridal outfit from the golden and jewelled headband down to the beaded slippers sewn by the bride. The museum was opened in August 1963.

To entice people into the museum again and again, exhibitions are held every now and then. These exhibitions range from Malaysian arts and crafts, and natural history to information on public interest campaigns. In addition, foreign embassies are invited to use the museum for special travelling exhibits from their own countries. Live demonstrations, singers and multi-media presentations spice up the shows.

One of the most successful exhibitions was one that featured the personal effects of a popular Malaysian actor, director, singer and composer, P. Ramlee, soon after he died. His films were screened daily during the exhibition. Popular singers and film stars were invited to perform and the museum was kept open until midnight. "A museum should not only show the past, but also the changes of the present," said the then director-general of the museum. Despite many raised eyebrows, a million people visited the museum during the three weeks of the exhibition.

Its specialised collections - often not on display for reasons of either space or security - include the largest pieces of Malaysian hand-crafted gold jewellery and Southeast Asian's largest collection of Chinese Islamic export porcelain. The museum also boasts of the best collection of local coins, featuring curiosities such as money in the shape of animals which was used in the tin-mining areas of Selangor, Perak and Pahang in the 18th and 19th centuries. There is also a collection of currency used only between 1935 and 1938 in the Sungai Buluh leprosarium in Selangor.

As protector of the nation's heritage, the government-funded Muzium Negara stands to safeguard national monuments and to prevent important objects from being exported. What it is building, more than a collection of artifacts, is a sense of nationhood, and it serves as a model of what can be done with an unlimited supply of imagination, energy, flexibility and optimism.

Passage 2

There are all kinds of jobs in the career market today for anyone who has the right qualifications and experience. Some people go for the most sought-after jobs such as doctors, engineers, lawyers or accountants, while others may choose to be a teacher, a policeman, a banker or a songwriter. There are, however, some people who choose to do bizarre jobs that are not meant for the meek and fainthearted.

There is a group of people known as snake milkers. These people work with deadly snakes and their job is to milk these snakes for their venom. The job requires the handler to hold the snake's head and let the fangs bite through a special milking vessel. A mistake can result in a lethal bite from these poisonous creatures. A bite from a viper, cobra, mamba, krait or rattler can cause serious injuries and even death within minutes if untreated. Snake venom is used to produce anti-venom and other pharmaceutical products. The anti-venom saves the lives of snakebite victims and medicines made from venom are used to treat stroke and malignant tumours.

High-rise buildings are amazing and beautiful works of architecture. They are also places where thousands of people work every day. Among them is a special breed of workers known as high-rise window cleaners whose job is to wash and clean the windows of these tall buildings. They need to be brave and do a clean job under uncomfortable and risky conditions. The cleaning teams have to hang outside the buildings on small platforms or special chairs which are attached to the top of the buildings in order to clean the windows. They are like 'urban rock climbers' who have to be experts with knots, ropes and safety harnesses. It is a very dangerous job as the scaffolding can break, ropes may wear out and snap, and the riggings may come off. Strong winds can likewise cause the scaffolding to rock and tilt, throwing off a careless cleaner to his death.

The next job is about the unseen heroes and heroines in a movie or TV show. Almost everyone loves an action-packed movie. The hero or heroine dangles from a helicopter, or races in a high-speed chase crashing into police cars or shop windows, or plummeting off a cliff into the sea. The villain is sometimes seen falling off a tall building or becoming a human torch engulfed in flames in the final scene. In reality, it is not the actor or actress who is doing all these actions but a stuntman or stuntwoman. They are the faceless action movie characters who work in the scenes of the movies that are too risky and dangerous for the actors and actresses. They are highly trained professional performers who have to attend special stunt schools to learn special stunt techniques and skills, like precision driving, martial arts and falling off tall buildings. Stunts are designed to be as safe as possible. Every stunt is planned, practised and rehearsed, but sometimes, the stunt can go horribly wrong. Stuntmen live on the edge every day on the job, doing death-defying stunts which may result in broken bones, serious injuries or even death.
